Alex Buchanan - York, 1974

I believe that God has this to say to us: There is little joy in my heart as I see your nation and the dark cloud above it; soon its underside will be tinged with red from the fire which shall fall on the land. My hand, which was once upturned as I lifted, supported and exalted it, is now downturned and I will crush and bring low because the leaders have led the people into sin. Oh that men would join their tears with mine, or do men think that I have an unfeeling heart? Once this land was great—from it I sent people to be ambassadors to give light and order to much of the world, but now, because it was great, great is its fall which I am bringing about as part of my judgment on it. See my hand in all this.

She who was mistress of much of the earth is now fallen and ravished by any foul spirit. These evil powers have raised up strongholds in the land; who will rise up and contend against them? Who will lay siege to them, watching and praying, weeping, but persevering until they fall? I look for those who will become mighty intercessors, for hollow are the foundations and strength is diminished in the land; light will not easily be rekindled in it. Strongholds will not fall at the mere touch of a finger. Your prosperity is gone and even the people of God will suffer, being greatly hindered. They will yet need to share their bread with one another.

But I have not left myself without worshippers. Before the holy ones in heaven I witness the worship, faithful preaching, and joyful obedience of many in this place. There are great gaps in the Enemy's ranks because of the effective work of my people; great therefore is the reward laid up for them. But now, as you have known the heights, learn the depths too. My people have laughed and sung, and rightly so; learn also to weep and mourn as the priests I have made you. Put one hand in mine, and the other on the damned and the desperate. Plead their case, and share the pains of God on their behalf, and add to your reward by so doing.

I do not entreat now, I command. My hand is extended to you in love with the scars which prove it, but it holds the sceptre, for I am the King of all. I will now tear down the facades by which you deceive your fellows; none will escape my grasp, none shall hide behind another, none be anonymous, nor a sightseer. Some will withdraw from the fight because of the cost of obedience to this word, and they will know my judgement, even to the shortening of their days. Be warned; repent before the sun rises so that I do not have to carry out my judgements. Rebuild the family altars, teach the word of God, guard the homes, maintain their unity and holiness. Remove all that hinders unity in this congregation that I may be able to use you to heal the land. Let the shepherds emerge and really lead the people of the Lord. Let them speak and not be silent, quell the turbulent, and check the sightseers, so that there may be health and strength in the body. Great will be God's pruning, but it will bring the results he desires.
